This presentation will discuss efforts on the campus of Elizabeth City State University, a historically Black university in North Carolina, to rehabilitate a Rosenwald School building located within its campus historic district. The Rosenwald school building program was established by businessman and philanthropist Julius Rosenwald to improve educational facilities for African American children during the era of segregation. Of the 4,997 Rosenwald schools built between 1913 and 1937, approximately thirteen were built on college campuses where these “Practice Schools” were used for teacher training. ECSU’s Rosenwald Practice School is the only remaining Rosenwald practice school in North Carolina and possibly the only remaining Rosenwald practice school in the United States. The multimillion-dollar project to rehabilitate and reinhabit ECSU’s Rosenwald Practice School has entailed years of planning, grant writing, archival research, collaborative partnerships, community outreach, and classroom education. In 2025, these efforts will culminate in the opening of a one-of-a-kind facility that will connect communities ranging from current students to the alumni of hundreds of North Carolina Rosenwald Schools to the rich legacy of African American efforts to acquire education in that state.
