In this presentation, Elias Bongmba will discuss the Civil War in Cameroon which developed from a strike that was called on October 6, 2016, by three Anglophone activists, Barrister Agbor Balla, Tassang Wilfred and Fontem Neba. The teachers went on strike to protest against the fact that Francophone Cameroon teachers who did not speak English fluently were assigned to teach especially STEM disciplines to Anglophone students, thus depriving them of a good education. Anglophone lawyers joined the strike protesting the fact that Francophone jurist who did not study the English Common Law tradition were appointed to preside of family cases in the Anglophone Provinces. The government of Cameroon did not respond to their demands and the leaders of the strike declared Anglophone Region independent from Cameroon and the new country the Republic of Ambazonia. A civil war ensued and continues today. I discuss this conflict and offer perspectives on the kind of dialogue that could end the war.
